Homepage: Supportful Server: Chat A chat is a form of human communication between or among a group of people through typed messages. This term usually refers to an Internet-based communication platform, such as a chat room, which usually allows free communication or participation between (online) users. Internet protocol An Internet protocol (IP) is the standard for exchanging information between computers on a network. The word protocol is from the French proto-col, from the Latin prefix pro-, meaning "before", and the Latin root col, meaning "whip". It denotes the layer at which two communicating devices agree upon the format of the exchanged data. A protocol can be classified as being either connection-oriented or connection-less.

Connection-oriented protocols establish a connection prior to sending each data unit, such as for a connection-based internetworking protocol suite, where an agreement is reached about the communication method for the transmission of data units between any two endpoints. This agreement is then used for all data units to be exchanged. Connection-less protocols, such as the User Datagram Protocol (UDP) and the Transmission Control Protocol (TCP), use a best-effort delivery method, in which the sending and receiving endpoints agree upon the best communication method and exchange data units through that method only. This method is suited to message-oriented computer protocols or real-time media.
